REFORMING AND RESTRUCTURING

Once the Acworth Committee had submitted its report in 1921, the Government began its campaign of major railway reforms in administration, management, and finance. Changes were aimed to consolidate railway policy for smoother operations and regulation, and mostly to bring the railway policy under a single rubric.

▲ GIPR officers pose for a photograph on the eve of the departure of E Fraser, the chief mechanical engineer of the company, at the GIPR headquarters in Bombay in 1930. The nationalization of the GIPR and EIR in 1925 saw a dawn of expansion under a more consolidated Railway Board.

The British Government in India accepted most of the proposals put forth by the Acworth Committee Report (see Change of Power) and appointed two committees in 1922 for the sole purpose of executing those suggestions. The Railway Finance Committee, under the governor of Punjab (1924–28), Sir Malcolm Hailey, and Indian Legislative Assembly members, focused on the rules, quantum, and method of