

4 ▲ Use a small brush, such as a No.1 round bristle, to add finer details to the background and to create aerial perspective. These details should be painted over dry layers to avoid mixing paint.

6 ◀ Increase the sense of light falling across the scene with layers of light color over the initial washes. Using a cool mixture of Titanium White, Yellow Ochre, and a touch of Viridian, paint light gestural strokes over shadowed areas with a large filbert brush. For warm areas add a little Alizarin Crimson instead of the Viridian.

7 ◀ Paint distant figures and objects with a cool brown, such as Raw Umber, using a fine brush, such as a No.1 sable round. When these details have dried, use even paler color in the background to increase the sense of aerial perspective and hazy light.

The look of this painting is clearly affected by the warm color of the toned ground, influencing the appearance of every hue in the composition. The finished look the ground gives allows the brushstrokes to be made quite sparingly, using paint thinned with turpentine to establish the scene, and thicker highlights to finish.

The mid-toned ground links separate areas of color and gives an overall warmth to the painting.

The colored ground provides an effective base for subtle juxtapositions of warm and cool color to be laid on top of it.

Dark tones have been painted with thinner transparent colors, while the lighter tones and highlights have been created with thick opaque color.

Colored grounds give a more finished effect, allowing for a much looser and relaxed style of painting.
