

▲ The 1865 Act codified liabilities for tramways along with the railways. Pictured here is a tram outside Colaba Causeway in Bombay in the 1900s.

Lord Dalhousie, India's Governor-General (1848–56), had always believed that the railways were a national enterprise and advocated that the industry's control and supervision be with the Government via a "regulated authority declared and defined by law". Consequently, the contracts that were drawn with the railways companies carried the provision for State regulation. It held control over the fundamental working of railways: determination and approval of routes, construction, fares, tolls, and finance.

Central Public Works