

WHEN BOMBAY MET CALCUTTA

Calcutta and Bombay, port towns of no commercial importance prior to the coming of the East India Company (EIC), became cities and, subsequently, hubs from where the railway network spread into mainland India. It was inevitable then that railway lines would connect these two cities someday. The Howrah–Allahabad–Bombay line, as it was called, opened for operations in 1870 when the line from the east met the line from the west at the town of Jubbulpore, right in the centre of India.
