

also served distinct military and trade purposes. It was no surprise then that by 1950, in independent India, the lines had expanded considerably to about 11,265 km of which 1,609 km, noted British historian JN Westwood, were “worked by adjacent main-line railways”. Of them, the Nizam’s railway was the longest at 2,212 km.