

▲ The Victorian Gothic architecture of the Delhi Junction has slender octagonal towers as its crowning feature.

Merging ideas

The Indo-Saracenic style, a blend of Mughal, Hindu, and Gothic influences, began dominating the design of public buildings by the early 20th century. The Chennai Egmore station, which was built in 1908, incorporated pillar brackets, eaves, and square cupolas. Hyderabad's Kacheguda station built in 1916 as a part of the Godavari Light Railway, falls into this category as well with ornate brackets as seen in old Indian temple architecture, and dome-shaped pavilions decorated with lotus motifs. It also had a ladies' area sectioned off from the main platform with a purdah wall, which allowed women to privately disembark from the train. In some cases, regional elements were incorporated into stations through the use of local materials for