

▲ The Koochpurwanaypore Swadeshi Railway's cover depicts Indian labourers manually handling railway tracks with an elephant.

Titled the Koochpurwanaypore Swadeshi Railway, the sketches depict natives in the make-believe state of Koochpurwanaypore, a name derived from the Hindustani words kuch parwah nahin, translated by the author as "it doesn't matter"; a place the artist believes to be a representation of India and its "tribe", a personification of Indians. The interplay between language and satire is reflected in the author's pseudonym as well – Jo Hookm – loosely translated to be "as you command". Since the identity of the author and illustrator was kept anonymous – some library sources identified him as a William Henry Deakin – in the absence of any other information on the subject, "his" nationality and other credentials can only be speculated.
