

THE KAKORI TRAIN ROBBERY

Ever since the Revolt of 1857, the British Indian Government and Indian dissidents knew that the railways in India were, and always had been, a soft target. In 1922, when Mohandas Karamchand Gandhi's Civil Disobedience movement was suspended after an incident that turned violent, the promise of self-rule through non-violent means seemed to become less and less likely. A wave of gloom overtook young revolutionaries, who now chose to seek Independence by any means necessary. The Kakori incident was a result of this resolve.
