

“communalization of the workforce”. Certain roles had traditionally been taken up by members of a specific community. The division of the country affected that as well. The Budget made note of one such example from the East Indian Railway (EIR). A number of the engine crew opted for Pakistan. The original agreement was that they would be released from their role gradually. Ever-increasing communal hostilities, however, meant that this was no longer a viable plan. As a result, the railways, along with other departments across the country, saw a sudden drop in staff. Crews from other railways were brought in to ensure service was not interrupted.

▲ Locomotive drivers ran special trains to relocate those Muslim residents who had opted for Pakistan following Partition.

Working together

The 1947–48 Interim Railway Budget speech outlined how the two new governments made temporary agreements to deal with the more immediate problems. For instance, the new designated borders had no facilities such as stabling rooms or arrangements for wagon and coach