

Pakistan, was stopped and around 100 passengers were killed while 200 were stabbed and injured.

Trains between Lahore and Lyallpur, and Ferozepur and Bhatinda were stopped on a regular basis and people were attacked, butchered, or raped by mobs. Retaliation followed retaliation in a seemingly never-ending cycle of violence. After an attack on the Frontier Mail on 24 August and the killing of 150 people on the Karachi Mail, train movement became sporadic. Special refugee trains started running across the borders in September, but this did not stop the mobs. As one British officer recounted: "In every carriage without exception the dead and dying were mixed up with the wounded – it was certainly a train of death."

There was some semblance of order by the end of October 1947 with better organization and an increased military presence. Wherever possible, soldiers from the Gurkha regiment – believed to be the most neutral – were stationed on trains. The repercussions of this horrific bloodshed continue to resonate across India and Pakistan in the neighbours' hostile relations today.
