

double-line traffic even as marshalling yards were extended, and sea routes were co-opted to take some of the load off the railways. The early years of independence saw a deep focus on re-energizing the railway system that had become dilapidated during the World War II era.