

TAKING SHAPE

When the second promotional phase for the railways in India began, the commercial ports of Bombay in the west and Calcutta in the east became the natural choices to be the first railway hubs. Soon, two primary groups of promoters emerged; one made concerted efforts in the west, even as the other led the discussions in the east. After receiving Government support, the two groups organized themselves into private companies.