

CROSSING BORDERS

From reviving its rail links with Pakistan and Bangladesh to building new ones with Nepal, the Indian Railways' international connections have played an important role in healing wounds, fostering bilateral relationships with its neighbours, and building a bridge of friendship.

Until 1947, the railways connected almost every corner of the Indian subcontinent, promoting the economy, fostering trade, helping protect its distant frontiers, and carrying people. The drawing of borders and Partition changed everything. The railways, a service that was never meant to be partitioned, split in two. Since then, for many decades, India and its neighbours have made several efforts to reconnect the lines in an effort to heal wounds and foster bilateral relations.
