
THROUGH THE WATER

Goa Express, Vasco da Gama, Goa–New Delhi

When it rains, the waters over the four-tiered waterfall known as the Dudhsagar Falls in Goa turn into a sea of milk. Hold your breath for the Goa Express that crawls its way, almost nonchalantly, over a moss-covered bridge, and past the white foam tumbling over the rocks from a height of 310 m. This section of the track is called the Braganza Ghat, 26-km-long, connecting Goa with the southern state of Karnataka on a ruling gradient of 1 in 37, passing through several tunnels. This is the highlight of the route that passes through the Konkan zone and connects Goa, a state along the western coast of India, with New Delhi, the capital of the country. While one can see the waterfalls and travel by train anytime during the year, it is best to experience it in the monsoon (June–August) as the Sahyadri Hills turn an emerald green and a train journey through this section is a sight to behold.
