

during this period, added further challenges for the Government. The Guarantee System in India using British capital, was, at best, a moderate success.

While, as connectivity improved, the revenues of the railways grew remarkably, except, during the 1857 Revolt, they never exceeded 3 per cent of the capital expenditure. Yet the Government was required to pay larger and larger amounts annually as guaranteed interest.