

£250 million. Various modifications to the Old Guarantee schemes were proposed to the secretary of state for India in Britain. The secretary, however, suggested that railway projects should be classified into “Commercial” and “Political”, the former being built through the Guaranteed System, while for the latter, direct Government agency was preferred. In March 1869, Lord Lawrence pressed for Government construction of railways. The secretary of state finally agreed to this suggestion and in the financial statement to the British Parliament, mentioned the policy change in the construction and operation of railways.

▲ An early 20th-century artwork of the office of the Bombay, Baroda, & Central India Railway.