

Railway stations from this period onwards were no longer utilitarian buildings.

▲ The old Churchgate station in Bombay was built in 1860 and named after a church gate, which was demolished for an expansion programme. The station pictured here does not exist anymore, as it was torn down and moved to another location.