

Fish Marine

Blenny lives in shallow water and often rests on the bottom.

Cuckoo wrasse is a colourful fish that lives in British waters.

Both eyes are on the upper surface.

Red mullet is probably the most important commercial marine fish in the world.

Zebra pipe fish hides in eel-grass.

Extremely poisonous fin ray spines

Large free dorsal fin rays

Lionfish is brightly coloured, which warns its enemies that it is deadly poisonous.

Royal gramma fish identifies itself to a mate with dazzling colours.

Panther grouper is a lethal predator like its namesake.

Clown triggerfish has a spiny dorsal fin that it can lock erect like a trigger.

Spiny boxfish has a rigid body from which it gets its name.

Port Jackson shark produces an egg case, or "mermaid's purse", in which the young develop.

Butterfish is well camouflaged among the brownish-green seaweed-covered rocks where it lives.

Angelfish are often brightly coloured.

Blue-ringed angelfish is flattened from side to side, making it difficult to see from the front.

John Dory sucks up its food in a tube formed by extendable jaws.

Hatchetfish lives in the deep sea and has luminescent lights along its sides.

Large sensitive eyes for seeing in the dark

Freshwater

Bitterling lays its eggs in a freshwater mussel.

Archerfish shoots a jet of water above the surface to capture its insect prey.

Minnows live in shoals for protection.

Minnows are small silvery fish that live in clean, fast-flowing, freshwater streams.

Unicoloured guppy, or toothcarp, bears its young alive, unlike most fish, which lay eggs.

Blue-ribbon eel is long and thin, allowing it to hide in narrow crevices.

Neon tetra is a very small, brightly coloured, tropical fish, often kept in aquaria.