

Too slow to duck, Thor's forehead took the full force of Hrungrnir's whetstone, which shattered into a million shards.

"Ow!" Thor exclaimed. "That hurt!"

"You won the duel," Odin said, examining his son's bloodied face, "but this doesn't look good."

Odin took the dazed Thor to see a healer called Groa. "There's a piece of the whetstone embedded in the bone," she said, "but I should be able to remove it."

Thor felt the shard move as the sorceress sang her spells.

To encourage her, he told Groa that he had seen her husband – thought to be long dead – alive in the wilderness. Unfortunately, Groa was so overcome with emotion at this news, she forgot her healing spells. And so the shard remained in Thor's forehead from that day forward.

Even Groa the healer couldn't get the whetstone out of Thor's head.

