

Thor and Loki were far from Asgard, exploring in Thor's goat-drawn chariot, when they came upon an isolated farmhouse.

It was getting dark, so they asked the farmer if they could stay for a night. He welcomed them inside and introduced his son, Thjalfi, and daughter, Röskva.

“Thank you for your hospitality. I offer my goats as a splendid supper,” Thor said.

The farmer frowned. “But don’t you need them to pull your chariot?”

“Oh yes,” Thor replied. “But I can bring them back to life tomorrow!”

The next morning, sure enough, the goats were magically restored. Thor asked if Thjalfi and Röskva would like to join them on their travels as helpers. The farmer agreed, but only if Thor left his goats behind in exchange. Thor did so, and the four companions set out together, crossing oceans and delving into forests until they reached Jotunheim.

One night, they were sleeping in a deserted hall when they were suddenly woken by a bone-shaking earthquake. To their amazement, they saw an enormous giant lying stretched out by the hall, snoring. Thor raised his hammer, Mjölhnir, to kill him, but the giant woke up just in time.

“Hello,” he boomed. “My name’s Skrymir. Have you been sleeping in my glove?” And with that, he picked up the hall and slipped it onto his hand.

The party set off once more – now with a giant for company. The following evening, Skrymir fell asleep under an oak tree.
