

Remember the enemies that the Aesir had made: Loki, tortured by a serpent; Fenrir, tricked and chained with his mouth propped open by a sword; baby Jörmungandr hurled by Odin into the sea to die. Now was the time for them to break free and have their revenge. Fenrir snapped his chain, spat out the sword and ran free across the land. His lower jaw tore up the ground, his upper ripped a hole in the sky, and he devoured everything in his path.

Far out to sea, Jörmungandr finally let go of his tail.

Water cascaded from his flanks as he rose like a mountain range from the depths. Towering waves rolled up the beaches to drown the land. Jörmungandr swam in their wake and spewed poison into the sky.