

The gods became worried when Kvasir didn't return, so they asked Fjalar and Galar what had happened to him.

"Kvasir was so clever that he drowned in his own wisdom," they lied. "We're sorry for your loss." Heartbroken, the gods returned to Asgard.

The dwarfs had not tired of killing. They asked a giant called Gilling to go boating with them. When they reached deep waters the dwarfs pushed him over the side and watched him drown, just for their own amusement. Stricken with grief, Gilling's wife wept and wailed long into the night. The murderous dwarfs found the noise quite annoying, so they dropped a millstone onto her head.

"That's three dead in three days," Fjalar said, rubbing his hands with glee.

"I've never had so much fun!" added Galar.

However, their luck was about to run out. When Gilling's son, Suttung, discovered what the dwarfs had done, he grabbed them in his huge hands and threw them onto a tiny island far out at sea. Fjalar and Galar knew they would drown when the tide rose, and begged Suttung for forgiveness. He agreed, taking the Mead of Poetry as payment for their crimes. Suttung knew how valuable the mead was, so he hid the three cauldrons deep inside a mountain and asked his daughter, Gunnlöd, to watch over them.
