

Odin transformed himself into a snake and slid through the hole. Overcome with guilt for betraying his brother, Baugi stabbed at Odin with the drill, but he was too slow.

As Odin slithered into the chamber, he transformed into a handsome man. He charmed Gunnlod, guardian of the mead, into giving him three sips – but instead of just sips, Odin emptied the cauldrons in three gulps.

It was time to flee. Odin turned himself into an eagle and flew towards Asgard, with the sunlight glinting on his golden wings. Infuriated, Suttung also turned into an eagle and gave chase.

When the gods saw Odin flying towards them, they placed bowls on the ground. Odin flew overhead and he spat the mead into them.

And so the Mead of Poetry now belonged to the Aesir – and all Suttung could do was return home and brood.
