

An illustration in the top left corner shows a dwarf with a long black beard and red tunic working at a forge. A fly is shown flying from the forge towards the title. The background is a mix of dark and light yellow.

The Forging of Thor's Hammer

Loki soon returned to the dwarfs' mines. Of course, being mischievous by nature, he decided to cause more trouble.

A large illustration on the left side of the page shows a dwarf with a long black beard and red tunic holding a large black hammer. The dwarf is looking down at the hammer. The background is a mix of dark and light yellow.

Loki found two dwarfs called Brokk and Eitri sweating at their forge – the air filled with heat, sparks and smoke. “Did you see the golden hair that the Sons of Ivaldi made?” Loki asked the pair.

Eitri waved a dismissive hand. “A passable job,” he said.

“Passable?” Loki scoffed. “I’d wager my head you two couldn’t make anything better.”

Brokk glared at Loki. “Your head would look good over our forge. We accept the bet.”

First, Eitri put a pigskin in the flames. As Brokk pumped the bellows, a fly – which was Loki in disguise – bit him. Brokk ignored the pain and Eitri pulled out a golden boar.

Gold was added next. Once again, fly-Loki bit Brokk, but the dwarf stayed calm and kept pumping until a magical ring was made.