

Finally, Eitri added iron to make a hammer. Brokk pumped, and fly-Loki bit his eyelid as hard as he could. Brokk had to stop working to wipe blood from his eyes, which created a flaw in Eitri's masterpiece – the hammer's handle was too short.

Nevertheless, the dwarfs presented their treasures to the gods, who'd agreed to judge the wager. Freyr received the golden boar, and Odin the magic ring.

The hammer went to Thor. "This is Mjölhnir," Eitri said. "When thrown, it'll hit the target every time and return to your hand."

Thor was delighted with the precious gift, and soon found some trolls to try it out on.

The gods decided that the dwarfs had won. But before Brokk and Eitri could draw their knives, Loki said, "I wagered my head, not my neck – and you can't take one without the other."

Deprived of their prize, the dwarfs sewed Loki's mouth shut and returned home.

