

One day, Thor awoke in the mood to go fighting, but his hammer, Mjölnir, was nowhere to be found.

After tearing his chambers apart in a rage, he went to find other – cleverer – gods to help him find it.

“This is serious,” Freya said. “Without Mjölnir you can’t protect Asgard. How could you have been so foolish as to lose it?”

“I didn’t!” a red-faced Thor bellowed. “It was stolen.”

“I bet the Frost Giants are at the root of this,” said Loki.

So Freya gave Loki falcon feathers to wear, and with them he flew to Jotunheim.

Thrym, king of the Frost Giants, grinned when Loki flew into his cavernous hall and skidded to a halt at the foot of his throne.

*“I know why you’re here,” said the king.
“You’re looking for Mjölnir.”*

“And I’m guessing from your smug expression that you have it,” Loki replied.

“I do. And Thor will only get it back if I receive fair Freya’s hand in marriage.”

Loki returned to Asgard and told Freya of Thrym’s demand.

“This again?” she cried, throwing up her hands in despair.

“Why is it always me whom these giants want to marry?”

“Because you’re clever and beautiful,” Heimdall said.

“So what shall we do?” Thor asked.

Heimdall’s face lit up with inspiration. “Thor should go to the wedding disguised as Freya and get his hammer back.”