

Thor was reluctant at first, until Freya spoke.
“If you don’t do this, Thor, Asgard will fall.”

“And I’ll be with you, disguised as your bridesmaid,” said Loki
Thor took a deep breath. “All right. Let’s do it.”

So Thor and Loki headed for Jotunheim in Thor’s goat-drawn chariot. Both wore beautiful flowing dresses, which Freya had adjusted to fit. Thor scowled behind his veil.

“Let me do the talking,” Loki said, as Thrym’s hall
loomed on the horizon.

“Whatever you say,” Thor growled.

They found the hall decked out for a lavish wedding ceremony and the tables were covered in so many mouth-watering dishes that even Thor cheered up a bit.

“Freya!” Thrym boomed. “I’m so happy you came!
You’re taller than I expected. Come sit by me.”

Thor took Loki’s advice and didn’t speak. Instead, he ate – a lot. Before anyone else had even finished their soup, Thor had consumed a roast ox, eight poached salmon, several baskets of pastries, and four barrels of mead.

