

The illustration depicts a wedding feast. On the left, Thor, with a red beard and wearing a white tunic and a white veil adorned with a yellow flower crown, stands and holds a large wooden hammer (Mjölhnir) high in his right hand. Radiating lines emanate from the hammer's head. In the foreground, Freya, with blonde hair and a yellow flower crown, sits at a table covered with a yellow cloth. She is wearing a yellow tunic and holding a golden chalice. In front of her are two large golden bowls. To her right, a three-candle candelabra sits on the table. The background features green triangular bunting at the top and stylized green trees. The scene is decorated with yellow and white floral patterns along the top and bottom edges.

“Thor, for goodness sake slow down,” Loki hissed.
“You’re in danger of bursting out of your dress.”

“I’ve never seen a woman eat so much,” Thrym said.

“Ah,” Loki said, “poor Freya’s been so lovesick for you that she hasn’t eaten for days.”

Seemingly satisfied with Loki’s lie, Thrym announced, “I must look into my betrothed’s eyes!” and he removed Thor’s veil, revealing the Thunder God’s glowering face.

“My,” Thrym said, “what piercing eyes you have.” Then he snapped his fingers at a servant.

*“Now it’s time to formalize our marriage!
Fetch Mjölhnir!”*

When the hammer was placed in Thor’s lap, the glare in his eyes turned into a gleam. “Hello, my friend,” he said to Mjölhnir. “Shall we teach these thieving Frost Giants a lesson?”

And so Thor killed Thrym and his family, returned to Asgard with Mjölhnir in hand, and Freya stayed happily unmarried.