

Idun and the Golden Fruit

*Odin, Loki and Hoenir were exploring the more desolate parts of the cosmos.
Food was scarce, so when they found a herd of oxen they killed one and set it over a fire.*

And yet, no matter how long it cooked, the meat remained raw.
“I don’t understand,” Odin said over his rumbling stomach.
“Then let me explain!” came a voice from above.

The gods looked up into the branches of a nearby tree and saw a magnificent eagle perched in the branches.

“It’s my magic that stops your meat from roasting,” the eagle screeched. “But I’ll lift the enchantment if you share some with me.”

Although irritated by the eagle’s impudence, the gods agreed, and soon the air was filled with the delicious smell of roast meat. “Me first!” the eagle said, and he hopped down from the tree and swiftly ate the best parts of the ox.
