On returning to Asgard, Loki found Idun gathering fruit in her orchard.

“Greetings, fair Idun,” said Loki softly.

“While exploring, I found a tree hung heavy with the most beautiful apples I have ever seen. Would you like to see?”

“I’d love to!” trusting Idun said.

So Loki led her away from Asgard, where eagle-Thjazi was waiting. He grabbed Idun in his talons and carried her off to Thrymheim – a place high up in the mountains of Jotunheim.

It wasn’t long before the Aesir realized she was missing.

“My hair’s gone grey and my joints ache,” Freya complained. “Where has Idun gone?”

“If we don’t eat her fruit soon, we’ll die,” Odin cried. “Who saw her last?”

“I spied her leaving Asgard with Loki,” said Heimdall.

Thor grabbed Loki before he could sneak away. “I knew you’d be involved somehow,” he thundered. “Go find her and bring her back, or I’ll crush you like an ant.”
