

The Punishment of Loki

Clever, sly Loki could usually talk his way out of trouble. But he knew the murder of Baldr could never be forgiven and that the Aesir gods would seek their grim revenge.

This time had now arrived. “Thor will probably knock my head off,” Loki said to himself. “I must make myself scarce.”

So Loki ran away from Asgard until he found a deserted spot near a river, way up in the mountains.

“I must ensure no one can sneak up on me,” thought Loki. “I know what I shall do! I’ll build a house with four entrances so that I can keep a lookout from all sides.”

Loki set to work, and after he had built his new home, he settled down to make a fishing net – all the while casting nervous glances through each of his four doorways.

It wasn’t long, however, before Odin the All-Seeing discovered Loki’s hideout. Without further delay, Odin and the gods set out to find him, bringing with them Kvasir – the wisest of all beings.
