

As soon as Loki saw the Aesir gods approaching, he threw his half-finished net into the fire, turned himself into a salmon and leaped into the river.

“Surely they won’t find me here,” he bubbled.

However, clever Kvasir found the burned remains of his fishing net, and guessed that Loki was hiding in the river.

The Aesir made their own net and began to drag the rushing waters for the trickster god.

Sunlight flashed on Loki’s scales as he swam upstream in front of the net.

“Soon the river turns to a trickle and I’ll be trapped,” he thought. “But if I leap over the net I can swim out to sea and escape.”

Loki propelled himself clear out of the water, but Odin was too quick and caught him by the tail. Loki wriggled and thrashed, but Odin did not let go.

“Time for you to pay for your crimes,” he growled.

The Aesir gods made a net to catch Loki.

