

A stylized illustration of a cave scene. A large black serpent with a green zigzag pattern along its back is coiled around a green stalactite. Its head is lowered, and a single drop of green poison is falling from its mouth into a dark bowl held by a woman. The woman, Sigyn, has long blonde hair and wears a green dress with a dark green shawl. She is kneeling on a green ledge. Below her, a man with long blonde hair, Loki, lies on his back, looking up at the bowl. The cave walls are dark green with jagged, crystalline shapes. Icicles hang from the ceiling. The background is a light blue sky.

Sigyn held a bowl to catch the dripping poison.

“Oh, we’ve not finished yet,” the goddess Skadi cried, and she set loose a serpent, which wrapped itself around a jutting stalactite directly above Loki’s upturned face. Poison dripped from the serpent’s fangs into Loki’s eyes, and the Aesir left the cave to the sound of his screams.

But Loki’s loyal wife Sigyn did not leave him, and lovingly caught the poison in a bowl. Every so often, though, she had to turn away to empty it. Each time, a few drops from the serpent’s jaws landed on Loki’s face, and his howls of pain were so loud they caused Midgard to shake.

And so this is Loki’s terrible fate – until Ragnarök, when he is destined to escape and lead the giants to war against the Aesir.