

The Marriage of Njord and Skadi

The giantess Skadi lived high up in the snowy mountains in a place called Thunder-home.

She was the daughter of Thjazi – the giant whom the Aesir killed for abducting the goddess Idun. When Skadi heard of her father's death, the walls of Thunder-home shook with shouts and wails, as rage and grief battled in her heart. In the end, rage won.

"All the Aesir do is meddle, steal and destroy," she cried, strapping on her armour and her skis.

"To them, life is a game and we are their pawns.

Well, this time their crime will be punished."

Skadi skied down the mountains into Asgard, and with a single kick smashed open the doors to the drinking hall where the gods were celebrating Thjazi's death. They all turned to stare as the grim-faced giantess strode inside, holding her bow and arrow aloft.
