

Sigurd and the Dragon

One day, Odin, Loki and Hoenir were taking a walk by a river when they saw an otter eating a salmon.

Loki threw a rock and killed the otter, and bagged both animals. “The salmon at least will provide a tasty meal,” he said.

Later, they came to a farmhouse and asked to stay for the night.

“Of course,” the farmer said. “Come inside. My name is Hreidmar, and these are my sons, Fafnir and Regin.”

“Dwarfs!” Odin said. “Then I expect you’ll have excellent food to share.”

As they ate a fine feast, Loki – in the mood to show off – held the dead otter up by its tail and declared, “Look what I killed with a single stone.”

A deathly silence fell over the table. “That’s my son, Otr!” Hreidmar bellowed.

“But... it’s an otter,” Loki stammered.

“Otr turns himself into an otter sometimes,” said Regin and without hesitation, he tied up the dumbstruck gods.

