

The Aesir's fear of Fenrir also grew quickly, so they hatched a plan to bind him up forever. First, they forged two huge chains from the strongest metal in the land. Then they challenged Fenrir to test his strength by breaking out of them. "Very well," Fenrir said. "I'm strong enough to snap any fetter you lot can make."

So Fenrir allowed himself to be secured with the first chain – called Laeding – and broke it with a single kick.

"I told you!" the great wolf snarled.

And so the gods turned to the second chain – Dromi – which was twice as strong.

Odin himself wrapped the heavy iron links around Fenrir's legs, confident that it was impossible for any beast to escape. The beast strained and bared his teeth. He thrashed and flailed, muscles nearly bursting through his skin. Finally, the chain shattered into a thousand pieces. The gods looked on in shock as Fenrir loped away.
