

PLANTS for SHAPE and TEXTURE

While colorful flowers enjoy celebrity status in the garden, designers often focus on plants with striking shapes and textures before considering blooms because such features offer more enduring interest. Choose a selection of foliage plants and those with attractive stems to create a decorative backdrop to flowers, or use them as features to embolden your schemes. Trees with peeling bark, such as river birch, make a statement, while architectural leaves, including those of a Japanese fatsia or palms, produce a dramatic effect.
