

Branding and rebranding

A brand is defined by the characteristics that mark a particular product. Branding is used to communicate a product's qualities to a consumer, and create a lasting bond between supplier and customer.

How it works

When a supplier develops a brand, it creates a defined set of values, expressed in product imagery, colors, logo, slogan, jingles, promotional imagery, and association with high-profile individuals or characters. The brand works for both the supplier and the customer, aiming to eliminate uncertainty and risk and to convey key attributes. Social media helps to promote brands—for example, 29 percent of Facebook users follow a brand and 58 percent have “liked” a brand.

The branding cycle

There are typical stages to branding a product. In order to rebrand (redevelop) a product, the supplier starts over at the beginning.

