

Customer profiling

Marketers can create detailed portraits of customers using internal company data on their purchase habits, preferences, and lifestyle, and cite external data sources to learn about attitudes and social trends.

How it works

In order to best understand their audience, marketing departments define their ideal customer by developing a customer profile. They build this profile by gathering information about the kind of person who usually buys the type of product they wish to introduce to the marketplace. The information they look at includes basic data about a person, such as gender, age, occupation, and salary, as well as more detailed ideas concerning the person's typical spending habits, such as the places where they like to shop and the amount they tend to spend.

Segmentation model

By constructing a segmentation model, layered with a number of variables (different levels of information) about consumers, marketers can gradually build up a clear picture of their ideal target customer—in this case, for a travel company.

Psychographic view

- ▶ Personality Outspoken; likes to stand out from the crowd
- ▶ Attitude Positive outlook and enjoys the good things in life
- ▶ Ethic Works hard and believes in contributing to social causes

