ESSENTIAL PEOPLE SKILLS

As well as recruiting effectively and ensuring that employees deliver, HR plays a role in nurturing essential people skills across the organization.

Relating to others

- Some people are natural leaders, but most leaders can benefit from objective thinking about the leadership strategy they wish to follow. See pp.88–89.
- Even in flattened, team-based hierarchies, team leaders need to develop leadership skills to guide and support their teams. See pp.90–91.
- Despite the revolution in technology, people remain vital to organizations, as skills and knowledge are central to success. As a result, HR has an expanding role. One example is Google, which calls its HR function People Operations (POPS) and treats its staff as a valuable asset, offering a range of attractive perks to “find them, grow them, and keep them.” See pp.92–93.

Managing projects

- Project management is an essential skill for managers at all levels, whether they are running regular day-to-day activities or special projects. See pp.94–95.

Negotiating

- The ability to negotiate successfully is an essential skill. Awareness of strategies and styles is key to success. See pp.96–97.
