

The human resources cycle

From the moment a company starts the process of recruiting an employee to the time that person leaves the company, the individual is in a cycle that is managed by the human resources (HR) department.

How it works

People are a significant cost to any organization—and of great value. Many CEOs talk about staff as their most important asset, and US industrialist Henry Ford famously said: “You can take my factories, burn up my buildings, but give me my people and I’ll build the business right back again.” The HR department is there to ensure that the right people are in the right roles so that the company can deliver the business strategy and maintain its competitive edge. The complexity of the business influences the stages in the HR cycle, but the basic elements are the same.
